

I have tried many ISPs, large and small. Invariably the smaller ones give better service. The larger ones are arrogant and only held in check by competition from their smaller brethren. I fear that if the FCC stops regulating broadband service, the result will be less competition, not more, because the major carriers could overprice their services to independents, or refuse them service altogether. Before rescinding regulation, please consider what might happen to the final consumer.